Where can you go to secure your Android and/or iPhone now that Apple is intercepting your emails? If you still take your security a little too seriously and have never used an Android, you might be out of luck. At least that's what a company called QNAP, which makes NAS and storage devices, just found out. Like most of the other mobile operating systems, Android and iOS were built with security in mind. Both platforms require users to verify their phones are really them, and owners are encouraged to change their password frequently so they can't be easily hacked. But that may not be enough if the two platforms and the third-party tools you use to access them have known security flaws for years, as with QNAP, and as we've seen with many other companies. Advertising According to a security researcher named Kevin Beaumont, QNAP has known as the email server for iOS and Android devices for years and left unpatched security vulnerabilities. And as the company hasn't told anyone about it, customers are left in the dark about the vulnerabilities and whether their devices have been compromised. "The majority of these systems are built on proprietary protocols, so it's unlikely we could get a bug [to fix] this fast, but we're putting together a proof of concept to demonstrate the existence of the issue," Beaumont said, in a blog post. The proof of concept, which QNAP has confirmed as authentic, is a simple remote command script that can be injected into a device without its owner's knowledge and take control of their system without them knowing. (A full version of the script is available.) A vulnerability f678ea9f9e
